Dear Paul:

I want to express to you once again my thanks for your participation in our discussion dinner on Eastern Europe on Thursday, 8 November. It was especially useful to be reminded of the enormous complexity of the problem of understanding and assessing developments in so diverse a region existing under such peculiar political conditions. The vigorous discussion that followed our visitors' opening remarks was just what we needed.

I understand that you also had a good session with the analysts on Friday morning, which adds to my gratitude.

You may assume that our National Intelligence Officer for the U.S.S.R. and Eastern Europe, and his assistants, will keep in touch. And I shall look forward to our next meeting.

Yours,

Dear Ross:

I want to express to you once again my thanks for your participation in our discussion dinner on Eastern Europe on Thursday, 8 November. It was especially useful to be reminded of the enormous complexity of the problem of understanding and assessing developments in so diverse a region existing under such peculiar political conditions. The vigorous discussion that followed our visitors' opening remarks was just what we needed.

I regret you were unable to remain for the meeting with the analysts on Friday morning, which, as I understand, was an equally vigorous and useful discussion.

You may assume that our National Intelligence Officer for the U.S.S.R. and Eastern Europe, and his assistants, will keep in touch. And I shall look forward to our next meeting.

Yours,
